Healing points used in traditional Chinese medicine

Healing points used in traditional Chinese medicine. The use of magnetism in medicine date back to ancient China where it was used in the treatment of certain diseases by applying magnetite (a form of iron-ore that occurs naturally magnetized) to specific points on the body.

Magnets were first used in ancient China for the treatment of certain diseases by applying a naturally occurring magnetic iron-ore to healing points on the body that influenced or produced an effect elsewhere. These points a more commonly known acupuncture points.

BACKGROUND

All materials exhibit magnetic properties due to the movement of electrons within their atoms however some materials show a very much greater magnetic effect than most, and are termed ferromagnetic or simply as magnetic. Magnets possess two points of maximum attraction called magnetic poles. The magnetic pole that points northward is called the north pole and its opposite end the south pole. It is from these poles that imaginary lines of magnetic force exist. These lines originate from the north pole and enter the south, returning to the north pole through the magnet itself, thus forming closed loops.

USE OF MAGNETS IN MEDICINE

The use of magnets and electrical devices to generate controlled magnetic fields has many medical applications particularly in medical diagnosis. The use of Magnetic Resonance Imaging offer safer and more precise results over X-rays and Magnetoencephalography is fast becoming a preferred technique for recording the brains activity. In 1974 researcher Albert Roy Davis, Ph.D. noted that magnetic fields had many effects upon the biological systems of animals.

MAGNETIC THERAPY

Many books and articles have been written regarding the health properties of magnetism provoking a large number of clinical trials and research around the world concentrating in particular on pain relief, headaches, accelerating the healing of bone fractures, arthritis, injury and many more, in fact countries such as Russia and Germany have carried out extensive research for over 30 years!

Australia has now joined millions of people worldwide in adopting the use of magnetism as a natural therapy for a range of health problems.

Magnetic therapy may be applied in many ways from small magnets to large machines but all involve either the placement of magnetic fields in direct contact with the area concerned or by stimulating acupuncture points as used in traditional Chinese medicine.
